

It Ain't So Awful, Falafel

By Firoozeh Dumas

Annotation

Cindy, a middle schooler whose given name is Zomorod, moves to a new California city with her Iranian parents. Set in the late 70's / early 80's, Cindy has to learn to navigate middle school, balance new friendships, and stay true to her parents and culture all in the face of anti-Iranian racism after the Iran hostage crisis.

Book Talk

She's moved to a new town, is starting a new school, and Zomorod, a.k.a. "Cindy" is an Iranian-American who has just given herself a new name. Now all she needs is some good friends and a way to navigate her new middle school. But when events cause some to be biased towards Iranians, "Cindy" learns fitting in may not be as easy.

Book Club Discussion Questions/Topics

- Cindy makes some very good friends throughout the story. In what ways do Cindy and her friends demonstrate their friendship for each other?
- Why is it difficult for Cindy to fit in at first? What are some things she does to fit in and build friendships?
- Cindy's family states that they don't necessarily practice their religion, but they do practice "kindness". In which ways do characters demonstrate kindness?

- Cindy often complains that she has to translate for her mother. Why does Cindy feel this way?
- The novel includes a lot of humor. What are some scenes that you thought were funny?
